How about this: I'm guessing a third of the movie going public thought seeing the previous Harry Potter was the most anticipated movie of the year. I'm guessing a similar proportion thought the Twilight movie was a big success. But I'm guessing a majority of that same third thought Transformers was the biggest Hollywood success. What is it about our media that makes it think we are all more interested in watching Harry Potter take on Voldemort than we are in Transformers 1 taking on Galactus? This is not meant as a criticism of the Harry Potter films. But we need to have a conversation about why the media thinks everyone wants to see Harry Potter and Voldemort's successor, and not the man who steals Galactus's spaceship and blasts him with a laser-axe. This is just the latest sign that Hollywood thinks people want to hear war stories, even when they know they're BS. But they do have a point. The ending of Transformers was one of the very best things in a movie I've ever seen. Galactus, that huge blue space creature, was something to behold. It's the first time I've ever seen a movie that made me feel like I'd been transported to another world, or at least another galaxy. This was not a case of the film's heart was in the right place, but the film's heart was in a different place to my own. And that was a novel experience. Transformers 1: Revenge of the Fallen (UK) / Transformers 2: Revenge of the Fallen (USA) / Was there any other reason for Transformers 2 to be released when it was? It was a steaming pile of movie – in fact, one of the worst in recent memory. I went to see it, but decided it was not worth the effort. I'd seen the first Transformers – the original – and I think I'd seen the cartoon. So I didn't know what was expected. What was expected was a film of epic proportion. What was presented was another one of those lots of CGI effects movies. The animation was poor, the characters were uninteresting, the plot was as dumb as it is possible to be and the script was appalling. It took no prisoners, it was very much 82157476af
